

Why a Master's Degree in Education at Thomas College

[Music]

The master of education at Thomas is a really excellent program and I think what makes it so good is that it's taught by educators who have been in the field, so we have been where you are, and we have a lot of experience as practitioners and as administrators.

We do a lot of work that brings theory into practice. So, you'll be doing a lot of things in your classes that really have relevant experience to your day-to-day work in your classroom or as an administrator.

Several classes that I teach, like childhood trauma, restorative practices, and then how to encourage belonging among students and work with diversifying populations of Maine, are classes that really push you to think about the ways in which you interact with students and create a welcoming environment in school.

We have many other courses that do the same thing. We want you to leave our program with hands-on tools, things that you can use immediately in your classrooms and as your role as an administrator, to be more effective practitioners in the field.
